General Data Protection Regulation

Personal data protection is fundamental to all types of organisation. Personal data is a lot more valuable than one can imagine. Data about people makes it possible to develop business models, conduct effective marketing campaigns and develop products and services. But just as for many other assets, there is a need for responsible use based on common rules. Organisations face a web of complex set of regulations surrounding the collection, use, retention and disclosure of information.

The GDPR was intended to make data protection a boardroom issue. It introduced an antitrust-type sanction regime with fines of up to 4% of annual worldwide turnover or €20m, whichever is the greater. These fines apply to breaches of many of the provisions of the GDPR, including failure to comply with the six general data quality principles or carrying out processing without satisfying a condition for processing personal data.

We offer our clients full legal advice in the area of data protection.

Our services include:

- developing and implementing solutions to support compliance in the area of personal data protection
- legal audits of data processing documentation and procedures for compliance with GDPR requirements
- drafting the full documentation for protection of personal data compliant with the GDPR
- representing clients in all proceedings before the President of the Personal Data Protection Office
- preparing the personal data breach reports
- conducting trainings on data protection in compliance with the GDPR
- development and implementation of privacy, security and cookie policies
- data protection aspects in clinical trials
